A. History 3351 meets the requirement of 3000 words of writing through the 3 formal essay assignments students must complete. In addition, students submit informal response essays every other week based on assigned primary documents.

History 3351 meets the following Exemplary Educational Objectives for Writing Intensive in the Disciplines:

1. Students are required to write throughout the semester and have many opportunities to improve their writing through work with one of the two primary instructors or through referral to a tutor in the Writing Center. Feedback on the assignments includes comments specific to writing, grammar and syntax issues, addressing areas of student weakness.

2. Writing assignments will introduce students to a variety of historical writing genres, including analysis of primary documents, summary and evaluation of secondary sources, synthesis of materials to produce a narrative, and original analysis of a historical topic through a combination of primary and secondary sources.

3 and 4. In addition to lectures introducing students to the topics, we ask students to read primary documents that give them a sense of the basic building blocks of historical analysis. For example, we lecture on the revolutionary tradition and ideas of French workers during and after the 1789 revolution and also have them read a brief autobiography produced by a chair maker in the 1820s detailing both his family and his work history through revolution and warfare, including his move to Paris and involvement in organizing his trade. We discuss all the primary documents in small, break-out discussion groups and have students write about them as well, to demonstrate through writing the issues and purposes of history.

5. Students will be expected to use standard footnote and bibliography format in a final paper turned in at the end of the semester. This differs from the current expectations for the course which were adapted when the course was listed for the International Business minor in European Studies. With the change in that program, we expect fewer business majors and will readapt the course back to make the writing expectations meet the needs of history majors.

B. Course Evaluation: Students are asked for feedback on assignments during the semester. The instructors continually adapt the course based on student input. The standard college student evaluation is administered at the end of each semester. Instructors review those evaluations when planning the course. Instructors meet prior to each semester the course is taught to revise the syllabus, lectures, discussion materials and assignments. Student feedback is incorporated at that time. The formal and informal assignments allow instructors to determine if students have mastered the course fundamentals as well as gauge their writing level and note improvements.
